SEEING DOUBLE

A new trend for two of everything, from bathroom sinks to his and hers dressing rooms has made it to the living room

With the news that Prince William and The Duchess of Cambridge have installed a second kitchen in their Kensington Palace home, and with stylish housing developments popping up all over Sussex installing two sinks in their en-suites (saving countless arguments no doubt) - trends in the way we are using our homes are changing.

Owen Pacey, fireplace expert for 25 years and founder of Renaissance London Fireplaces, has noticed a change in the way we use our rooms, smaller single living rooms, or separate kitchens, dining and living spaces are now being opened up to make larger, double, open plan living areas, often revealing two fireplaces that no longer match, or creating space for a bold statement of two striking original fireplaces, with beautiful symmetry.

With this in mind, Pacey developed a bespoke reproduction fireplace service for this reason, enabling him to recreate stunning matches of beautiful original designs, using unique aging and immaculate carving techniques he has painstakingly developed, alongside the finest materials and marbles. They typically cost a third of that of an authentic period piece - but look true to the original.
